ABSTRACT

Early childhood is a critical era of mental and emotional development, and what children see and experience during this time can have a significant impact on their future: Our childhood settings, as well as how we react to them, can predict our adult health and well-being. Since the preschool era plays such an important part in children's growth and learning, early childhood educators have long been concerned with character, morals, and values. Character education cannot be developed in a split second and takes place in a variety of settings. One of these can be caused by the culture and atmosphere of the institution. School culture and climate are phrases that describe the environment that influences the behaviour of both instructors and students. Climate is defined as behaviour, whilst culture is defined as the school's values and standards. Nearly 90% of instructors at schools with strong instructional cultures succeeded in raising standards and keeping track of students' development. It deals with numerous characteristics, including honesty, compassion, loyalty, respect, trust, and responsibility, under the impact of early childhood character and cultural education. Those aspects might also be implemented by parents scaffolding, supporting, and educating their children through play, music tales, visual aids, and photographs in their daily lives.
